On what seemed to be an ordinary Thursday afternoon, the atmosphere at the renowned KitKat Gentlemen's Lounge and Laundromat buzzed with the familiar presence of its regular patrons and a colorful mix of eccentric barflies. They gathered in eager anticipation of the much-loved “Happy Hour,” a cherished tradition that promised a delightful escape from the mundane. As the clock inched closer to the designated hour, the excitement in the air was palpable, with conversations flowing freely and laughter echoing off the walls.

The allure of the bar's signature two-for-one drink special, featuring a selection of the house's famously diluted concoctions, drew in both seasoned locals and curious newcomers alike, all seeking to unwind and indulge in the vibrant social scene that the KitKat had to offer.

In the dimly lit corner of the bar, the barkeeper's vintage Admiral television flickered with a nostalgic glow, a relic from a bygone era that he often boasted was the last television manufactured in the United States before the world changed dramatically with the infamous "The Day the Earth Fell Flat" in the early 1970s.

This cherished piece of technology, with its wood-paneled frame and slightly warped screen, served as a backdrop to the lounge's atmosphere, where patrons gathered to share stories and laugh. Meanwhile, the screen displayed the familiar logo of CNNister, a state-run media outlet that the barkeep had cleverly tapped into by pilfering the cable connection from the elderly woman residing in the efficiency apartment above the bar.

This clandestine arrangement not only provided a source of entertainment but also a sense of connection to the outside world, as the barkeep and his customers engaged in spirited discussions about the news, all while savoring the comforting ambiance of their favorite watering hole. As I lifted my chilled club soda to my lips, my gaze drifted to the television screen where CNNister was fervently engaged in a contentious discussion, dissecting the chaotic aftermath of the New Tulsa Government's attempts to restore civil order.

The debate, steeped in political trivialities, seemed to revolve around the remnants of a decade marked by the Ahriman Great Social Reset, a controversial initiative that had left society in disarray.

CNNister, flanked by his cadre of WEF Goonie Henchmen, passionately argued for a return to a bygone era, romanticizing the 13th Century as a time of peace and simplicity.

They espoused a vision where the Coalition of Willing Nations, once proudly referred to as the Western World, would embrace a life devoid of material possessions, claiming that true happiness lay in the absence of the burdens imposed by modern technology. This idealistic narrative, however, felt like a thin veneer over the harsh realities faced by the masses, who were still grappling with the consequences of a world that had spiraled into chaos.

Unbeknownst to the eclectic group of regulars lounging in the KitKat, the self-styled star cocktail waitress, Miss Sylvia, casually remarked that the aging pundits over at CNNister ought to spice up their panel discussions with more intriguing topics, such as “Why Johnny can no longer blink.”
She paused for a moment, allowing the weight of her suggestion to linger in the air, knowing full well that many of the critics, particularly those from the Anti-Emil camp, would dismiss her ideas as nothing more than a gimmick designed to attract attention—an assertion that echoed the teachings from the renowned Columbia School of Journalism's Home Study Guide, a program Emil proudly claimed to have completed, though this assertion remains a point of contention among the current administration of the school. Sylvia's second suggestion, “Things that I wished I had never seen!” was met with a mix of chuckles and raised eyebrows, as the patrons pondered the absurdity and depth of her proposed topics, revealing a longing for discussions that transcended the mundane and ventured into the realm of the bizarre and thought-provoking.

As a proud alumnus of Columbia School and a lifelong member of the International Royal Order of Hobo Travelers (Local # 451), I chose to remain silent and not engage in the ongoing debate, adhering to the principles instilled in me during my training as a reporter.

The wisdom found on page 37 of the universally recognized Hobo Guide is quite clear: it emphasizes that a well-trained Hobo should avoid getting entangled in discussions that could distract from the primary goal of being vigilant for opportunities, such as collecting spare change or spotting unattended drinks at the bar.

This approach not only reflects a commitment to the hobo lifestyle but also showcases the importance of maintaining focus on the essentials, ensuring that one remains alert and ready to seize any chance that may arise in the bustling environment around them.

Despite my initial inclination to dominate the discussion with my audacious rendition of the “Tales of Brave Ulysses,” inspired by my own experiences wandering the legendary “Hobo Trail” that meandered through the most remote and rugged corners of the fourth, and perhaps even the fifth, world, I found myself captivated by the topic at hand.

Rather than diverting the conversation with tales from my past, which were steeped in the rich tapestry of a life spent in the shadows of myth and adventure, I chose a different path.

Later that evening, I returned to my modest third-floor efficiency apartment, characterized by its cracked plastic windows that let in the chill of the night air.

There, in the solitude of my cluttered space, I began to curate a personal anthology of memories—people, places, and events that I would prefer to erase from my mind.

This collection, a reflection of my desire to confront the ghosts of my past, became a cathartic exercise, allowing me to sift through the remnants of experiences that lingered like shadows, reminding me of the complexities of my journey.

In the spirit of complete honesty and adherence to the principles outlined in the bylaws of the Jesuits of Truth—an organization of which I proudly consider myself a founding member—I feel compelled to share my current predicament.

elevate your rather misguided Ahriman Woke lifestyle.

The truth of the matter is that my recent endeavor to curate this peculiar assortment of photographs was largely motivated by the pressing reality of my overdue rent.

I found myself in a position where I was contemplating the possibility of persuading the local postmaster to use the newly established "mojo" wire telegram service.

My hope was that by sending this collection to my corporate overlords at the WWWG Plantation and Print Shop, I might receive a generous advance check, conveniently wired to me at the recently reopened Western Union, conveniently

As you read these words, I sincerely hope that I have managed to escape the harsh reality of spending my nights in the park, enduring the discomfort of sleeping outdoors and sharing my morning routine with fellow souls in Patriots' Park. It is a challenging existence, one that I wish to leave behind.

In the spirit of optimism and transformative thinking, I find solace in the shamanic-inspired rituals I learned during my time at the famed Gris-Gris Addiction Treatment Center in Ward Five. These practices, aimed at dispelling negative energies, have become a beacon of hope for me, guiding my
